

Hey!

Date Me Doc version 1. Booyah! This is a fair bit off the cuff, so pardon me if it doesn't read like your favorite novel.

Look at this guy looking at you:

Cliff notes:

- Heterosexual dude
- Aged 37 like fine wine
- Enjoys sports
- Checks many boxes for autism and ADHD
- Happy with eye contact just not when talking or listening
- Emotionally capable and forever learning
- Black-belt cuddle master
- Looking for a committed long-term relationship
- Wants to raise children of his own
- Living in Berlin
- Grew up Budapest, Hungary
- Prefers English for thinking and deep conversations, native Hungarian, okay with German

And the prose in first person:

I've never written a Date Me Doc until now (2026-09-10) and I'm feeling part self-conscious, part like stating obvious facts, because I've known myself almost four decades and you might have never seen me. I think DMDs are not a great way to get to know someone, but they are good to advertise approximate preferences so that you can recognize if this is definitely not for you, so that we can skip our first date feeling like an interview. "Pray tell me, where do you live?" "It's Berlin, I quite enjoy it here thanks to a number of friends from various groups, and the cultural freedom of the city, but not being around mountains or rocks or any kind of landscape is a bit of a bummer. At least we have some cool trees and lakes in the neighborhood. How about you?" "Ah unfortunately I live in X." "That's a bummer. Wanna still go on a date and see if we want to make an effort later on?" [...]

"So, do you want to have kids?" "Uhm yeah, in short yes, I see them in my future, so much so that I've refrained from seeing great matches for that reason alone. In fact I regularly help a friend of mine take care of her 8-months-old. Are you reading any good book lately? Also, feel free to cut my words if I'm too verbose, I prefer conversations that are not just an hour of question-answer-period on repeat. If you vibe with something, say so or make the excited face!"

Political discussions usually don't move me, unless it's very nitty-gritty and it's about the consequences of specific interventions. However, I like to act as if we are behind a veil of ignorance, so injustice and double standards have a tendency to infuriate me.

I enjoy explaining concepts I understand well, often involving analogies that are relevant to your life. Reading books out loud. I dislike asking AI for every minute question, and, as pompous as it may sound, I enjoy thinking and solving problems the hard way, using my processor made out of meat. There is some inexplicable beauty with interacting with the imperfect solutions and handcrafted artifacts of humans instead of the sanitized words of a machine – sounds cliché, or antirationalist, but anyhow, I think capable AI consumed our society all too quickly. (However, I won't pretend I don't ask it for research or facts. I just ask it less for opinions.) Human decision-making is a dying art and I want both of us to carry this torch forward and teach this skill to our kids by example one day. I amuse myself by phrasing things in conversations in a way that makes you pause for a sec and allows you to figure out the answer yourself, 'cause I get a kick out of you being smart, and like to give these moments of "oh I get it". I like to ask what you really mean, especially when it sounds like your words don't reflect your emotions or your values – not gonna lie, this comes across as super annoying if you don't know me so most of my (now) friends thought at first I was a dick. Needless to say, I speak my mind a lot, but I still like to filter through the trifecta of useful, kind, and necessary.

I enjoy sports, and being strong, and looking strong. Part of the reason for working out is so that I feel safe and my friends feel safe with me at the dead of the night. These days I run a lot, which I sometimes find meditative, sometimes just annoying. Racking up the kilometers in preparation for my third marathon.

I make things, repair things, but it's oh so hard to begin either of these activities regardless of how much I enjoy them. (Okay, replacing zippers is sometimes annoying. I don't do zippers anymore.) I saw wood, I sew fabric, I see a problem, too many interests... Oh I love typography too! Look at this beautiful Helvetica Neue Light Italic. Look, shiny.

I'm currently unemployed, living on the savings from my decade of software engineering. Financially stable for the time being but not yet retired. Considering beginning a career in woodworking.

Anyhow, date me, if you're looking for an emotionally close relationship in Europe, if you're not against living together and founding a family with your future partner, with plenty of cuddling and physical touch. Get in touch via a tap on the shoulder or via Telegram at @SlowTreeSky or email at laszlo.tre@icloud.com.

This dude runs:

Posing in my self-made vest in front of the horse statue I helped build:

The week I quit skiing:

My headboard of my own design and making:

