

Hey!

Date Me Doc version 1. Booyah! This is a fair bit off the cuff, so pardon me if it doesn't read like your favorite novel.

Look at this guy looking at you:

Cliff notes:

- Heterosexual dude
- Aged 37 like fine wine
- Enjoys sports
- Checks many boxes for autism and ADHD
- Happy with eye contact just not when talking or listening
- Emotionally capable and forever learning
- Black-belt cuddle master
- Decent at maths and sciences and reasoning
- Looking for a committed long-term relationship
- Wants to raise children of his own
- Living in Berlin
- Grew up Budapest, Hungary
- Prefers English for thinking and deep conversations, native Hungarian, passable German

And the prose in first person:

I don't find date me docs a great way to get to know someone, but they are good to advertise approximate preferences so that you can recognize if this is definitely not for you, so that we can skip our first date feeling like an interview. "Pray tell me, where do you live?" "It's Berlin, I quite enjoy it here thanks to a number of friends from various groups, and the cultural freedom of the city, but not being around mountains or rocks or any kind of landscape is a bit of a bummer. At least we have some cool trees and lakes in the neighborhood. How about you?" "Ah unfortunately I live in X." "That's a bummer. Wanna still go on a date and see if we want to make an effort later on?" [...]

I would like to eventually live together and raise a family with my partner, so much so that I've refrained from seeing great matches for that incompatibility alone. In fact I regularly help a friend of mine take care of her 8-months-old.

I feel at home among rationalists, I pivoted my career to work on AI alignment but that didn't yet pan out. I organized a 100-person Summer Camp for effective altruists twice. I'm a member of a community-run maker space in Berlin, great people with creative spirits and an inspiring environment. I put a fair amount of energy into my friendships – but it's the kind of energy that feeds you even when you're giving it – and I was told I am, quote, “super helpful, reliable and willing to be there.” I sometimes spend time away with friends for a weekend trip or a month.

I make things and repair things, but it's oh so hard to begin either of these activities regardless of how much I enjoy them. (Okay, replacing zippers is sometimes annoying.) I fold paper, I sew fabric, I saw wood, I see a problem, too many interests... Oh I love typography too! Look at this beautiful Helvetica Neue Light Italic, shiny. Disco balls, karaoke, even though I can't sing.

Political discussions usually don't move me, unless it's very nitty-gritty and it's about the consequences of specific interventions. However, I like to act as if we are behind a veil of ignorance, so injustice and double standards and cheating have a tendency to infuriate me.

I love explaining concepts I understand well, often involving analogies that are relevant to your life. I dislike asking AI for opinions, and use it mostly for objective questions like “who sets the pace lights at middle-distance runs” or “help me with this tax problem”. I get a kick out of you being smart so I amuse myself by phrasing things in a way that makes you pause for a sec and allows you to figure out the answer yourself. I like to ask what you really mean, especially when it sounds like your words don't reflect your emotions or your values – not gonna lie, this comes across as super annoying if you don't know me so most of my (now) friends thought at first I was a dick. Needless to say, I speak my mind a lot, but I still like to filter through the trifecta of useful, kind, and necessary.

At times I am way more verbose than necessary, and then I don't mind being interrupted, in fact I find it great if we don't just question-answer-period-repeat for an hour, or you just make some excited faces. I'm often emotionally aware of the room and like to include people who look lonely. Though at times, it's really appreciated if I'm being listened to, especially on an emotional topic, and a heartfelt “how are you” with a minute of full attention feels better than an hour of nodding along.

Mental health wise, my anxiety would get the better of me at times, especially when alone, and it's hard to get myself to attend an event or do much productive. Maybe it's untreated ADHD and medication will help; work in progress. External deadlines for sure help a ton. I am sensitive to harsh lights or noises or smells (I hate the smell of incense), or humid rooms with stale air. Social skills don't come naturally but I keep forever learning them, and am better than average at some.

I enjoy sports and movement, and being strong, and looking strong. These days I run a lot, which I sometimes find meditative. I do partner acrobatics, dancing, rock climbing, lifting big rocks, swimming, cycling, you name it.

I'm currently funemployed, living on the savings from my decade of software engineering. Financially stable for the time being but not yet retired. Considering beginning a career in woodworking.

Anyhow, date me, if you're looking for an emotionally close relationship in Europe, long distance is fine for a while if you're not against living together in the future and founding a family, with plenty of cuddling and physical touch. Get in touch via a tap on the shoulder or via Telegram at @SlowTreeSky or email at laszlo.tre@icloud.com.

This dude runs:

Posing in my self-made vest in front of the horse statue I helped build:

The week I quit skiing:

My headboard of my own design and making:

